

We Burn Undead

What is dead cannot die.

The Fallen of the Dragon Isles were made by Eldar gods — and they fear naught except fyre. The dead are dry: old bone, grave-linen, tomb-dust, the leathered husk of a thing that stopped drinking centuries ago. Nothing takes a torch more gladly. Light the barrow, and stand back.

“We burn undead.” — the old barrow wisdom, and more oil than sense.

At the Battle of the Thousandfold Curses the Eldar had trapped the Kha’din inside the Wintercrowns and were losing. Reshuk, god of the dead, offered the oldest bargain: he would summon his children to win the war, if the living promised to feed them. Desperate Eldar agreed. Power surged into the fallen on the field, and they rose not alive, but Deurg’Gul, the Undying Ones — what lesser tongues call the Fallen. By dawn they turned their blades on kin. The Undying Lands became Sepulchre — also called Dearg-dul country, Tir’Na’Deurg’Gul, the Sea of Bones. Some say the Kha’din’s own curses raised the dead, and Reshuk only turned them against the host that spoke them. Either way, every later thrall, barrow-wight, Zuhl, and vampire lord is a younger echo of that first bargain.

Folklore says the Fallen are beyond most threats to mortal man — hunger, age, and disease leave them alone. Veterans who lived to tell the tale recount how spears, arrows, and even swords held to thrust into gaps in knightly plate had no effect. Sorcerers reluctantly admit magicks aimed at the living are useless: illusion, charm, sleep, fear, hold, and their sympathies. Yet the joys of life are shut to the fallen: they cannot enjoy sunlight, cross running water, enter a house uninvited, take bread nor ale nor salt. Animals and beasts see things truly, and suffer not the wight.

The old tales may wander and contradict one another, but the oldest say “fyre maketh et goote”. Dry bone and grave-linen are kindling — torch, oil, naphtha, a thrown pot, holy water or holy oil. Burning purifies what should never have walked; a brand thrust into the press turns the husks that fear fire. Willful Fallen laugh at bare flame. Bring more oil than you think you need.

The Fallen remember what they were. Heart turns them because you call up what they miss — old longings, duties, loves, and fears — while the fyre brand is what they cannot endure.

The hard ask is your own. Anyone the Fallen slew may look only dead — a friend, a hireling, a Boss’s sworn hand. Carry them home for a clean burial and by Midnight they may rise as that thing’s spawn. Put them on the pyre with the bones and they rest. Same choice waits for the living when a Fallen Wound opens. When the Fallen wound you, they do more than cut: the hunger that raised the Deurg’Gul reaches through and begins to claim you. As Midnight nears the cut grips, chills, and writhes. The body already knows the hour is coming.

| “Boys, hold Herrick down and bring the fyre, we need to purge him.”

Game Rules: Undead

Fire Turns Undead

- Turn Undead: 1 Turn outside a fight. Use a torch, bonfire, holy oil, or other Incendiaries to show the undead you mean to burn them, driving them back. If asked by the Referee, roll 2d6 + Heart vs Hit Dice + Heat. HD is the kind in the firelight (a zombie knot is HD 1, not thirty summed) — or the worst husk among them if mixed. Heat already prices how many press the room. Meet: husks that fear fire and can see the flame recoil 1 Turn (the knot in reach of the light, not every corpse in the bottle). Miss: they come on. Flask spent; torch not.

- Brandish: combat Action. Fuel an attack with torch, brand, holy water, or holy oil, or Fuel a Spark to Man-handle. Against husks that fear fire, the brand is the right tool (pay the Fuel claim as usual at Referee speed). Man-handle: force them from your light 1 round on a fail of their contest (or just rule it if they have no press). No effect on willful Fallen. Thrown fire: [[Burners Arms and Armor#Incendiaries & Alchemy]].

Fire Burns Undead

- Pyre of the Fallen: 1 Turn outside a fight. Pyre + Incendiaries; burn bones of the fallen and bodies of those they slew. Burned: no spawn. Unburned: may rise.

Fallen Wounds

- Fallen: as everyone knows, anyone slain by undead becomes undead.
- Fallen Wound: a Wound opened by the Fallen — an aggravated Wound. It does not heal naturally (rest, sleep, or the day's climb), and normal healing spells and potions do not improve HP until purified. Aggravated Wounds in general: [[Burners Adventure Game#Healing and recovery]].
 - Midnight: first night unclean, and each night after — deepen severity and HP by the Fallen that cut you, then Survival. Husk (skeleton, zombie, or other Fallen with no level drain): deepen by 1. Major Fallen (wight, wraith, spectre, vampire, or any with level drain): roll 1d6 + 1d6 per drain (wight drain 1: 2d6; drain 2: 3d6).
- Purge: 1 Turn. Spend one Incendiary; deepen severity and HP as Midnight; then Survival. Live: Wound purified. Die: no spawn.
- Survival: immediate 2d6 + Craft vs severity (helped if a friend holds you). Fail or alone → die. Die unclean → spawn. Live after Midnight: still unclean.

Example. Herrick 3 HP, gambeson AC 2 vs barrow-wight (drain 1). Blow 5 soak 2 → 0 (no Wound). Blow 9 soak 2 → -4: Fallen Wound severity 4. Shock + helped after-fight survival OK; still unclean. Midnight or Purge: roll 2d6, deepen by the total → Survival (purified if Purge and live; dead unclean → spawn; dead from Purge → no spawn).

A note to old school players: undead do not cause level loss on touch unless you prefer that to the above.

Picking an OSE monster (stats & XP)

Burn Undead is how undead work — fire, Fallen Wounds, spawn, no level drain. OSE is the shelf you take numbers from: Hit Dice, AC, attacks, special kit, Morale, printed XP.

Prefer the monster's printed XP from the OSE SRD (or the full Awarding XP table: base by HD + bonus per * ability). The short HD→XP chart in [[Burners OSE Conversions]] is a coarse shortcut — e.g. it lists HD 3 as 60, but a Wight is HD 3* and XP 50.

Use from OSE	Do not use from OSE
HD → 2 × HD pile (white/red); printed XP (or HD + * table)	Energy drain (levels lost)
AC → hint for white/red mix only	Cleric Turn Undead as written
Attacks / damage die → quote weight / claw slots	Anything that contradicts fire / Fallen Wound
Printed specials you keep (gaseous form, regen, charm...)	—
Silver / magic to hit → heavy white; players claim silver/magic as the right tool	—

Husk or Major Fallen? OSE name tells Midnight deepen (XP from SRD):

OSE	HD	XP (SRD)	Band	Midnight deepen
Skeleton	1	10	Husk	+1
Zombie	2	20	Husk	+1
Ghoul	2*	25	Husk	+1 (paralysis stays if you want it)
Wight	3*	50	Major, drain 1	2d6
Wraith	4*	125	Major, drain 1	2d6
Mummy	5+1*	400	Husk*	+1 (*no OSE drain — disease as written or skip)
Spectre	6	725	Major, drain 2	3d6
Vampire	7–9	1,250 / 1,750 / 2,300	Major, drain 2	3d6

*Or call mummy Major if you want it to feel willful — fire is already its doom.

Hybrids (like a draugr): take kit from the OSE monster that matches fiction, take HD / shell from how hard you want the fight, take Major / drain N from the OSE drain ladder (or one step below if you dialled the fight). For XP, either:

- printed award of the nearest whole monster, or
- build it: HD base + one bonus per special ability you keep (* on the Awarding XP table).

Example — Lothian A4 Draugr: Monster XP 500 (keyed; HD 5 shell, not stock wight / not OSE vampire). Payday: coffin + lung vault listed gp at 1 XP per 1 gp. Party said vampire; pinholes = sleeper clue. Fallen Wound, not level drain.